Located in Lujiazui, Shanghai's evolving financial hub, the Mandarin Oriental is among the more recent luxury openings on this side of the river.

Set just a street back from the landscaped waterfront, this place offers unbeatable views of the The Bund, Shanghai's historic concession-era promenade, directly across the river.

This hotel is taller rather than wide, much like the city itself. The brightly tiled lobby in itself is compact, enclosing a small but efficient reception desk and a handful of chairs beneath a sprawling light installation. Elevators whisk guests up to their rooms or downstairs to restaurants and the spa. A lobby-level tea lounge buzzes with gentle chatter throughout the day.

Downstairs, Zest serves delicious Asian and Continental cuisine from a cheery open kitchen all day. Nearby Yong Yi Ting specializes in Jiang Nan food, which translates literally to "south of the Yangtze River," a regional cuisine known for light, delicate aroma and flavors. In the lobby level of the adjacent residential apartment block, 58 Grill channels Shanghai's art-deco splendor with Michelin-starred chef Richard Ekkebus serving modern French fare.

Hugging the lobby, Riveria lounge is a cozy place for meetings, particularly during the daily afternoon tea. Classy Qi Bar's talented bartenders whip up creative cocktails from 4 pm onward while local DJs spin on the outdoor terrace, late into the night.

The Spa has already garnered praise for its wide range of holistic treatments in 13 stunning spa suites that channel feng shui. Guests are invited to arrive 30 minutes early to avail themselves of the sauna and aromatherapy showers and linger post-treatment in the bamboo-shaded tea lounge. The nearby gym is open 24 hours and packed with fitness buffs making use of the state-of-the-art equipment and nearby pool. The fitness center also offers classes in tai chi, Pilates and Fusion fitness, a combination of martial arts, kung fu and boxing. If you've forgotten your gym clothes, don't fret. Swimsuits and workout clothes are for sale, albeit at inflated prices.

Two stunning ballrooms and eight additional boardrooms and function spaces cater to meetings of all sizes, accommodating 10-500 guests. An outdoor space in the landscaped gardens is also popular for large weddings and parties.

Rooms and suites offer contemporary decor with light wood panels and warm palettes, even if some decor appears slightly dated. Basic rooms on floors three to 20 offer 50 sq m, twin or king beds with thick duvets and goose-down pillows, work desks, Illy coffee makers, 46-inch LCD TVs with a huge selection of channels and movies, iPod docking stations, high-quality audio systems and interactive entertainment systems. High-speed wired and wireless Internet access is available for up to four devices, and housekeeping comes by twice daily, including for turndown.

Baths include deep soaking tubs, separate rain-forest showers, twin vanity areas, plush terry robes, luxury toiletries by Ormonde Jayne and a second TV. Premier Mandarin River view rooms offer superior views that include the iconic Pearl TV tower for a nominal fee.

Club Level rooms come with the usual bucket of extra upgrades, such as butler service, private check-in and private lounge access, a swanky library and a wine bar on the second floor serving breakfast, lunch, afternoon tea, evening cocktails and canapes. There are only one-bedroom suites in the hotel tower; guests looking for more space can ask for connecting rooms or upgrade to multibedroom suites in the residential tower. Along with Club access and superior digs, premier-level suite guests enjoy a complimentary river cruise on the hotel's boat.

Check-in is 24 hours, and the clock starts at the time of your arrival. There is high-speed wireless Internet access throughout the hotel, and the friendly, efficient staff is very professional and speaks excellent English.

Quality, value and service make this hotel one of the best business options in Lujiazui.

However, travelers hoping to stay nearer Shanghai's main tourist attractions may prefer the Fairmont or the Peninsula, both of which occupy prime real estate along Shanghai's historic waterfront.
